Why Use Study.Net

Study.Net manages all copyright permissions and clearance needs for Harvard; using Study.Net ensures that Emory is in full compliance with copyright.

GBS faculty must use Study.Net whenever assigning Harvard-published materials for class readings, including:

- Case studies
- Harvard Business Review articles
- Chapters from books published by Harvard

Study.Net Contact

Why do I have to use Study.Net for Harvard-published materials?
Due to the licensing agreement contracts of Harvard Business Publishing, all faculty must use Study.net for Harvard-published materials. There are strict copyright policies that Harvard requires for its materials, and all Emory faculty must comply and pay for the use of any Harvard-published materials separately if they are part of course readings, even if Emory Libraries already licenses access to these materials (e.g. the Harvard Business Review is available via Business Source Complete, but this access point cannot be used for required course readings per Harvard’s licensing agreement). Study.net is the designated platform for access to these materials.

Any attempts to bypass Study.Net to access Harvard-published materials for course readings will be considered an infringement of copyright and a violation of our legal requirements per Harvard’s licensing agreement.

No exceptions to this policy can be made; we appreciate your understanding and strict compliance.

Looking for non-Harvard published materials?
If you are looking for non-Harvard published materials for upcoming courses, we encourage you to use GBL Course Reserves system, as well as your Faculty Toolkit.

Through GBL Course Reserves, the business library works with you to set up online access to your required course readings. Your requested course materials will be organized in syllabus order, and they can also be linked to your Canvas course for convenient student access. While you cannot use Course Reserves for Harvard-published materials, a wide range of reading materials can still be made available to you via Course Reserves.
